WAEA Fellows

Shida R. Henneberry , Oklahoma State University

Shida Henneberry is Regents Professor, Humphreys Endowed Chair in International Studies, and Director of the Masters of International Agriculture program at Oklahoma State University. Dr. Henneberry's 30-year career has generated significant research output in areas of international agricultural markets and marketing of local foods. She has published over 60 articles in peer reviewed journals, receiving awards for excellence in research and numerous citations. She is frequently asked to serve as a guest editor and on editorial boards. Dr. Henneberry has made significant contributions in outreach instruction, study abroad courses, and pioneered development of online courses in trade and in food marketing. Her undergraduate and graduate teaching have resulted in several awards from student, university, and government organizations including the 2014 USDA Excellence in College and University Teaching Award.

Kerry K. Litzenberg, Texas A&M University

Kerry Litzenberg is Presidential Professor for Teaching Excellence, Regents Professor, and Minnie Steven Piper Professor at Texas A&M University. Dr. Litzenberg's contributions to the scholarship of teaching, learning, curriculum development, and in program leadership have been substantial. Dr. Litzenberg has taught over 10,000 students since 1978 in all western states. His student evaluations are uniformly superlative. His classes communicate information that alumni describe as being fundamental to their success. He has received teaching awards from national, international, AAEA, other professional, and industry sources, including the USDA

Food and Agriculture Excellence in Teaching Award. He has published 28 journal articles on teaching, all of which has led to him being a frequently invited speaker and reviewer of academic programs for several departments. He has shared his teaching expertise by mentoring several faculty at other Land Grant institutions. His leadership has been influential on professional teaching efforts, including being co-investigator for the national Agribusiness Education Development Project, being a founding member of IAMA, and directing the USDA Food and Agricultural Education Information System. He has also worked to develop interdisciplinary programs, including being invited to lecture in the TAMU Mays Business School and developing the joint Agribusiness degree at Texas A&M.

GianCarlo Moschini, Iowa State University

GianCarlo Moschini is Pioneer Endowed Chair in Science and Technology Policy at Iowa State University. He has made fundamental contributions in several areas of agricultural economics research, including demand analysis, production theory under risk, applied risk management, intellectual property rights and agricultural policy. These contributions have created a sustained stream of excellence in research. His more recent research contributions have been related to the economics of innovations, including the welfare impacts of genetically modified crops, of biofuel policies, and of quality in food markets.

His contributions to the policy implications of his research are a prominent complement to research in the aforementioned areas. His research has affected WTO policy, the design of subsidy and countervailing duties in the hog and pork sector, decoupled programs under distortionary taxes, and stabilizing price policies. His contributions also complement his record as an excellent and dedicated teacher. His student evaluations are above department average for each of the courses he has taught. He advises and mentors graduate students, demanding excellence which motivates students to pursue academic positions and promote early career development. HE has also contributed to the profession by serving as an associate editor of the AJAE and on the AAEA Board of Directors.
